Mojo in the 14th Century.
(Longman's Life and Times of Edward III.)
The Pope, John XXII, believed in the intervention of infernal forces in the world of the living, and had contributed to the spread of the belief in France. Philip was a firm believer in the diabolical art, and was convinced that Robert had made use of his wicked devices to work him harm. Robert was equally a believer, and, desiring by magic means to protect himself from the power of his enemies, he caused a certain monk named Henry Becheval, of the order of the Holy Spirit, to be brought to him at Avignon. After making him swear to keep the secrets he was about to reveal, Robert caused a little box and lock of gold, and a wax figure about eight inches long, with hair on the head, and made to represent a young man. The monk, who was called Henry, was told to make a wax figure of the king, and to put in it all the evil thoughts and desires of the king's heart. The monk, who was called Henry, was told to make a wax figure of the king, and to put in it all the evil thoughts and desires of the king's heart. The monk, who was called Henry, was told to make a wax figure of the king, and to put in it all the evil thoughts and desires of the king's heart.
